RECAP SENT

May 19, 2026

Matt — thank you for the conversation today. You shared a clear picture of where DiBara is, where you want it to go, and the operational gaps in between. This recap captures what I heard so you can correct anything I got wrong before I send the proposal.

01 — WHAT WE DISCUSSED

The state of the business today.

DiBara is a $12M masonry and concrete contractor, owner-led, with an established sales team (1 inside sales manager, 3 inside reps, 2 field sales techs) and a production structure built around a production manager, an experienced PM, a couple of in-house crews, and primarily sub labor. You are actively rolling out HubSpot's Marketing and Sales Hubs through your marketing agency partner. Your weekly financial cadence with bookkeeping and production is already in place — which is more than most $12M contractors can say.

You're heavily invested in sales, hiring "killer" reps has been difficult enough that you're considering relocation, and you're looking for an operations leader to come in, set the infrastructure up, and potentially run it.

02 — WHAT I HEARD

Five themes worth addressing — in priority order.

1 Job costing doesn't exist at the job level yet.

The weekly review is at the P&L level — not at the job, service-line, or crew level. Until that visibility is built, margin recovery is hard to measure and harder to defend.

2 There's no CRM behind the sales handoff.

The marketing agency is standing up Marketing and Sales Hubs — but the production-side workflow (job ticketing, customer-facing status, punch-list) doesn't yet have a home in HubSpot.

3 Work order ownership is undefined; subs are ordering materials.

When we tried to identify who creates and tracks work orders, the answer wasn't clear. With subs procuring materials, one of your largest cost lines sits outside DiBara's direct control.

4 Sales runs through you — and only through you.

The team is in place, but every deal still touches your desk. The lever I'd recommend isn't another hire — it's a rigid, formal, documented sales training program for the existing inside and field team (and the next hire), with scripts, scorecards, ride-along cadence, and weekly review.

5 The weekly financial review is reactive, not forward-looking.

The cadence is a real strength. The next version of that meeting drives weekly decisions — rolling cash forecast, job margin scorecard, leading indicators — rather than reporting on what already happened.

WORTH NAMING

The weekly financial cadence — Matt, bookkeeping, and production at the table every week — is the foundation everything else builds on. Many contractors at your stage don't have it. You do. That's a meaningful head start.

03 — WHAT I'M BRINGING BACK

A two-phase engagement with one optional concurrent phase.

Within 24 hours I'll send a full proposal. The shape of it:

PHASE 0

OPS Assessment

Operational diagnostic. 90-min session + written report + debrief.
Weeks 1–2. $997 (credits to Phase 1).

PHASE 1

Active Retainer

Fractional COO engagement. Starts Month 1. $4,000/month. Month-to-month — no long-term lock-in.

OPTIONAL PHASE

HubSpot Service Hub Build

Production-side workflow build. Concurrent with Phase 1 in Month 1 if elected. $3,500 bundled rate.

Phase 0 is the gate. It exists so we both know exactly what we're signing up for before Phase 1 begins. If the diagnostic surfaces something materially different than what we discussed today, Phase 1 scope will be adjusted before any further commitment.

04 — Next Steps

- This week: 30-minute walkthrough of the proposal — I'll send a Calendly link.
- Confirm I got these right: trade mix (residential / commercial split), trailing 12-month gross margin, whether you're the sole owner or there are co-owners to align, and your bookkeeping point of contact.
- If we proceed: Phase 0 intake form goes out the same day we have a signed engagement letter. Diagnostic scheduled inside one week of that.

If anything in this recap is off — wrong number, wrong framing, or something I missed — let me know before the walkthrough. I'd rather correct it now than build a proposal around the wrong picture.

Looking forward to the next conversation.
